

The Fantasy Sports Writers Association is pleased to announce its 2015 Hall of Fame class. Our six-person selection committee cast final ballots last week, selecting three new Hall inductees...

Joe Bryant: Joe is a co-founder of Footballguys.com, one of our industry's leading providers of fantasy content and tools. He has been responsible for recruiting, hiring, managing and mentoring the remarkably talented staff at FG. Bryant has written about fantasy sports for over 25 years and played the game much longer. He introduced Value Based Drafting (VBD) to the fantasy community, one of the most important, enduring and useful concepts in our game.

Jason Grey: Jason launched Mastersball.com in 1997 and over the years has produced insightful, high-quality content for MLB.com, SI, RotoTimes and ESPN. He is a 2007 graduate of the MLB Scouting Bureau Scout Development Program and was hired by the Tampa Bay Rays as a full-time scout in 2012. Grey has not only been a pioneering fantasy writer and outstanding reporter, but he's also one of the most talented fantasy players and strategists our industry has seen. He is a three-time Tout Wars winner and two-time LABR champion.

Alex Patton: Patton is the author of nine books on rotisserie baseball player valuation, and he began analyzing and writing about our game in 1988. He developed the concept of Stage Theory in rotisserie baseball. Patton helped develop one of the game's first draft software programs, and he has been a contributor to ESPN, BaseballHQ and various annuals. Today, he can be found at PattonandCo.com.

We congratulate these industry pioneers and look forward to celebrating their careers in the days and weeks ahead.
